Infiltration Made Easy

In the 1960s and 70s meetings would be held by brothers and sisters who were at the forefront of the Black struggle. All of them knew someone among them was probably a snitch or government infiltrator, but as they looked from face to face they could not tell who the traitor was. Many were detected, mainly because of the personal interaction that took place. Sooner or later something would happen that would clue a true brother or sister in, and the infiltrator would be outed (not in the most effective way, unfortunately for Us).

All progressive movements suffer from infiltration; it's part of the process. It has made some noteworthy accomplishments more difficult to arrive at, but it has never stopped a group of people with a do or die attitude. Still, one needs to be able to observe the other people who proclaim themselves part of the struggle, see them when they might have dropped their guard, be around them in an environment that might hold a clue to their real allegiances. One can't make this type of observation in a chat room or other internet assembly, and that's why I don't take advantage of that element of high technology.

We all know the government is listening to phone calls, intercepting, reading, delaying and redirecting emails, and joining in in an intrusive and uninvited way when people communicate using other methods. Even the content of electronic messages is being altered! We can't ignore those media simply because the government has infiltrated them, but we can't be reckless either. When it comes to determining what We need to discuss in order to advance Our struggle, the old ways of communicating serve Us better than the new. High technology offers every advantage over the grapevine but one; privacy. Therefore, when it comes time to communicate anything serious, something not high tech is Our best bet.

Expanding Communication

I have made contact with some individuals in several Spanish speaking countries. Specifically, these countries include Mexico, Venezuela, Colombia and Cuba. For the most part, the brothers and sisters there are experiencing much of what Black People in the United States have experienced and continue to experience. What is lacking is a sharing of information between them and those of Us with an independence or nationalsit agenda, and the major culprit is the language barrier. If they could read what progressive Blacks in the United States write and We could read what progressive Blacks in those countries write, all of Us would be a lot better off.

Up to this point, when they get access to something about Us, something that has been translated, it is the point of view of a negro, an apologist or a sell-out, not a proud Black person who is seeking independence from white America's government or someone who thinks America should be tried and convicted for the wrongs the country has perpetuated. We need to change that. For that reason I have recently had one of my books translated to Spanish and am working on translating two others. I will have them available for free download for a while and then put them on sale online at a moderate price as pdf documents.

To help make sure the translation is as close to accurate as possible, some of the brothers and sisters I know in other countries review the translations and make the grammatical changes they think are necessary. I then review the changes they made and decide which changes will appear in the final document. I doubt seriously if there will be any financial gain from this, but the information sharing gains could be huge. If some of you brothers and sisters who write would like to do what I am doing, contact me. There is a lot of work involved in this so there will be a fee, but getting independent minded Black ideas to those outside of the United States could well be worth the monetary sacrifice.
